ABSTRACT

The literature of Caribbean-born writer Caryl Phillips has gained critical prominence during the last two decades thanks to his texts, which meticulously depict historical, cultural and psychological facets of the black diaspora.

This dissertation takes as its prime objective the examination of overlaps between Phillips's representation of the diasporan subject and his use of fragmentation as a formal device. The different chapters of this thesis suggest that Phillips's writing bears witness to his creative rendering of the realities of the diasporic condition, either thematically, through a constant focus on migration and fluctuation between spaces, or aesthetically, through a series of techniques meant to convey the sense of fragmentation. In this conception, I would like to postulate that the experience of the diaspora and the fragmentation in the selected works of Phillips represent an inextricable duo.

To advance my argument, the first part of the dissertation is dedicated to addressing the thematic aspect of fragmentation. The first two chapters complement each other in that they take into account the subtleties underlying the various strands of the diaspora while covering historical, contemporary and even metaphoric experiences of migration and displacement. In turn, the second part of the dissertation is devised to examine the formal techniques that Phillips resorts to while formulating his vision of the diaspora. For this purpose, three overlapping chapters inquire into the multiplicity of points of view, structural disjointedness and generic fluidity, which are viewed as essential elements conveying the sense of fragmentation in the selected corpus of Phillips's works.
